Who should attend?

Program Overview:

This course provides a framework for strategic decision making regarding the use of third parties, and the management of associated risks. Recent industry trends will be explored, particularly the increasing marketplace demand for innovations which may test a firm's capabilities to deliver internally. Supply management professionals will be challenged to consider a model for leveraging third party manufacturers while treating them as strategic partners, in order to mitigate risk while reducing waste. A supply chain segmentation model will be put forth as a practical model to facilitate make vs. buy decision making. Product life cycle management considerations and risk management will also be addressed with regard to the use of third parties.

Skills You'll acquire:

Attendees will be better equipped to improve operational performance in the following ways: Allocate inventory investment more effectively, increase agility and flexibility, optimize costs through improved efficiency, grow overall demand while minimizing internal cannibalization, and contain capital expenditures.

Who should attend:

This course is ideally suited for managers who make decisions regarding make vs. buy, and for individuals who are looking for best practices in managing the use of third party manufacturers. It will benefit those who are trying to improve their organization's return on investments and manage capital expenditures, as well as those who wish to improve their speed to market with new products. It should be attended by anyone in the organization who wants to understand a process for third party decision making, selection, contracting, and management.

Format:

A full day, instructor-led seminar, with interactive discussion and exercises to engage the participants in an interactive manner.
